team before they are published. The city-run Los Angeles transportation agency, known as Metro, is planning to do away with fare machines and offer riders more money in exchange for their personal information. The L.A. Times reports the change would cut Metro's $40 million budget and give passengers a better deal on fares and transfers. Passengers would still enter the ride sharing agreement through the yellow box, but wouldn't need to fiddle with tokens. Instead, travelers would rely on an app as well as Metro's new mobile fare payment terminals, called M-Passes. These wireless devices would interact with smartphones and other handsets when they're plugged into a standard jack. Previous Metro systems are already equipped with the M-Pass, but the new system would track the movement of customers rather than using fare cards or tokens. All trips, including bus and rail transportation, would be tracked through the M-Pass system. It's a plan of efficiency as Metro officials remove a feature of the current system that passengers either hated or never used. To properly track riders, Metro officials now require users to register with the agency using an app, ID card, passport or other government ID. This gives commuters the option to sign up for automatic bill paying, which would set up a regular account for commuters to monitor fares and transfers. However, commuters can opt out of this feature at any time. In exchange for signing up, commuters would get $2 off their fares and free transfers during the first year. Until now, commuters have only been limited to purchasing monthly cards worth $100 or $120, which can be used to pay for unlimited travel or for 14 days of riding and then reuse. The M-Pass system would account for people who aren't new commuters. Instead of having to purchase a set number of tickets, users can buy or pay for a pass for as much travel as they want. Passes can also be converted into one-use M-Passes or recharged when the pass expires. All rides would come with a minimum $3 fare, which would rise with
